The Humanities major will develop critical oral communication, analysis, and writing skills and prepare students for a wide range of contemporary work environments and professions. Humanities students engage in the interdisciplinary study of complementary fields such as English literature, religious studies, linguistics, music, visual and performing arts, and philosophy.

The School of Professional Advancement awards the Bachelor of Arts in Humanities degree following the successful completion of 120 credits, including 30 credits in the major. In order to fulfill the major core course requirements, students must earn 12 credits in 1000/2000 level and 18 credits in 3000+ level humanities courses. Students must complete foundational courses (1000 or 2000 level) in three different humanities areas, such as English, philosophy, religious studies, art history, art studio, digital design, communication, linguistics, language studies, Africana studies, music, theater, or another humanities area chosen with an advisor. Students will take another lower-level humanities course, followed by five upper level humanities courses. As their final requirement, students will complete an interdisciplinary Capstone seminar course. Students will have the option to complete their Capstone as an independent study in cases where there is low enrollment for the Capstone seminar.
